

The South Harbour Sanctuary

A series of big office buildings were put up by the waterfront in the late 80ies and early 90ies including companies like Sonofon, Noika, Daimler Chrysler and Ericsson.

The road going pass the area is: South Harbour Street. South Harbour Street (Shown on the photo) is one of the most heavily trafficked roads in all of Copenhagen.

It is the main road for west and south Sealand and Sweden (Malmö) form the center of Copenhagen. A heavy trafficked road like this has the ability to create an imaginary impenetrable wall.

As a pedestrian or cyclist you don't really want to go/pass places like this unless you have to. Since there is nobody living in this area either -the result is that there is completely no life after office hours. Once you pass South Harbour Street your all by yourself!

This is the "entrance" to Brickworks Harbour or Teglværkshavnen as it is called in Danish. The pictures shows the view just 20 yards/meters after I passed the road.

In my opinion this is one of the sanctuaries of Copenhagen. This is one of the few secret places that still exists in Copenhagen.

Here you see the situation a bit closer South Harbour Street is the red one.

It is a great place for thinking and clearing your mind or to go with a good friend to hang out. It is very quiet, sunny and you get an excellent view of the small Tileworks Harbour.

As you can see in the picture they are building residential buildings on Floodgate Islet, 5000 apartments in total -over the next couple of years. This means that this quiet city space is - as they often are -only is a passing thing. Today I was there for about 1 ½ hours and only meet 2 people on foot and 3 in a boat. Not much for (close to) central Copenhagen.

Not a person for miles!

I did not bring my bathing trunks today - but if you're not too scared of seaweed (I'm not), it is clean and pure water strait from Øresund perfect for swimming – although it is illegal (but who cares?).

The Green dots on the map mark the photopoints from the trip.
